Trump, Xi and Putin: The new great power game has begun

Today China is courted by both the United States and Russia, reflecting an emerging new kind of relationship among the big powers of the world. The back-to-back May 2026 summits of Chinese President Xi Jinping, first with President Donald Trump of the United States and days later with President Vladimir Putin of Russia in the Chinese capital, were cautiously and anxiously watched by the international community.

Many analysts penned numerous articles examining who won and who lost in the Trump-Xi meeting. Others compared and contrasted Xi's meetings with Trump and Putin and indicated how China's relations with Russia turned out to be more cooperative, strategic and friendly than those with the United States. The two summit meetings in Beijing do not provide adequate inputs to decipher a trend in big power relationships. President Trump visited Beijing against the backdrop of falling popularity at home due to the negative outcomes of his tariff gambles and waging an unnecessary war against Iran that faced a stalemate despite a shaky ceasefire. His highest tariff rates against China and abusive rhetoric had already angered the Chinese government, which weaponised rare earth exports in retaliation. Xi had understood after meeting Trump in South Korea in October last year that only a demonstration of power would induce the US President to make compromises. And China's power was clearly on display when Trump visited China. In the way Trump keeps shifting his policies from time to time, apparently to confuse the opponent or partner, Xi signed no agreements on any issue and only expressed willingness to buy agricultural products from the US and Boeing aircraft. The numbers and figures were all notional and no deals were finalised. The large number of CEOs of Corporate America who accompanied Trump secured no deals. The Xi-Trump summit, nonetheless, symbolised that President Trump failed to Make America Great Again and rather had to justify Xi's observations about a declining America by saying that it was a reference to the Biden presidency. In actuality, it was Biden who gave more headaches to Xi than Trump by doubling down on the first Trump Administration's economic cold war against China, by repeatedly saying that the US would defend Taiwan if attacked, and by strengthening the Quad and promoting an Indo-Pacific Economic Forum.

Trump, on the other hand, climbed down to reduce tariffs on China after facing rare earth export controls initiated by Xi; halted the decision on selling weapons to Taiwan; remained tight-lipped when Xi openly waived the Taiwan red line; and returned home almost empty-handed, while ruminating on his way back that the US would not fight a war more than nine thousand miles away in the Taiwan Strait. Chinese officials and analysts had frequently expressed the view that the United States was a declining superpower and, through the optics and statements during Trump's trip, sought to project the US as a less influential global power. Trump's failure to end the Ukraine war and eliminate Iran's nuclear programme, despite tall claims about them, played into the Chinese narrative. Trump had already faced the embarrassment of refusal by the NATO allies to participate in the Iran war. And Xi now appeared to have offended Trump by making no offer to help end the stalemate in the Strait of Hormuz.

The G2 that isn't and India's strategic opportunity

When China wanted it, the US didn't. Now the US, in all signals, seems to want it, but the Chinese are not interested anymore. And India knows and sees this. We are talking about the G2 world or a world where power at the top has been shared by the two great powers, the US and China. Two recent diplomatic missions told us a lot about how this G2 vision is shifting. President Donald Trump visited Beijing for the first state visit by a US president to China since 2017, lavishing praise on Xi Jinping as a great leader and friend while calling the summit's garden the most beautiful roses ever. Meanwhile, Secretary of State Marco Rubio travelled to New Delhi to repair strained US-India relations, yielding no major deals and reinforcing that Washington's India partnership remains fragile amid trade and immigration disputes. These parallel journeys tell a story: America's establishment, whether Trump's transactional nationalism or the foreign policy elite's multilateralism, has reconciled itself to a G2 world – a condominium of US and Chinese power. But China, increasingly confident, no longer wants to accommodate that arrangement.

with the US trimming tariffs and China agreeing to pause its rare earth export controls for a year. Washington also quietly dropped a regulation that would have tightened export controls on sanctioned entities' subsidiaries – a loophole Beijing had been exploiting to source advanced semiconductors.

By the time Trump arrived in Beijing this month, he had already made concessions before setting foot on Chinese soil: agreeing to sell Nvidia's most advanced AI chips to China and suspending a $13 billion arms sale to Taiwan. These were not the actions of a man arriving to project strength. They were the actions of a man who had already decided that the deal mattered more than the principle. In exchange, the headline outcomes were modest: China pledged to buy at least $17 billion in American agricultural goods annually through 2028, offered some commitments on rare earth access, and both sides agreed to another meeting in September. On the issues that actually define great-power competition in the 21st century – artificial intelligence governance, cyber operations, technology export controls, and digital sovereignty – relatively little progress was made. These are not peripheral concerns. They are the questions of the coming decade. On all of them, China held its ground. And on Taiwan, Xi placed the island at the very centre of the relationship, warning the American president that it was a red line that, if mishandled, could destabilise everything. Trump, for his part, subsequently called arms sales to Taiwan a very good negotiating chip, a remark that set off alarm bells in Taipei and revealed how far Washington's implicit guarantees had drifted from their moorings. Trump also spoke about how far America was from Taiwan and how near China, another hint at how the president sees the future US role in the conflict.

The G2 worldview, in other words, is alive and well in Washington. What has changed is Beijing's appetite for it. The American establishment's movement toward G2 thinking didn't begin with Trump. The concept was first proposed in 2005 by economist C Fred Bergsten to encourage the world's two largest economies to stabilise global markets. It gained momentum under Barack Obama, who initiated the Strategic and Economic Dialogue in 2009 to foster relations.
